Nonprofit organizations need to communicate with a variety of audiences in order to carry out their goals and objectives, including: (1) to recruit, motivate, and retain personnel and volunteers; (2) to convince potential donors to give, and current donors to continue giving; (3) to inform and educate the public about the policies and objectives of the nonprofit organization; (4) to persuade and influence public officials to support or advance the nonprofit organization's goals and objectives; (5) to deal with members of the media who are reporting on topics and issues of interest or relevance to the nonprofit organization; (6) to inform and persuade various other organizations to cooperate or work with the nonprofit organization; and (7) to respond to controversies or crises that could adversely affect the nonprofit organization. This book contends that nonprofit organizations can improve the effectiveness of their communications efforts by developing or adopting a communications plan or strategy that organizes and integrates their various communications, rather than communicating in a piecemeal, ad hoc manner. The authors present their theories and concepts about strategic communications for nonprofit organizations, and make suggestions and recommendations for how nonprofit organizations can improve their communication efforts. Rather than just offer abstract ideas and theories, the authors provide various examples and brief case studies to illustrate and support their contentions and arguments. And, the authors offer a section with information on various publications, organizations, and Web sites that can serve as resources for nonprofit organizations seeking to improve their communications efforts.
